

These four sit within about six miles of one another, and two of them are not in the City of Portland at all. Maplewood and Garden Home are direct neighbors across the Multnomah—Washington county line, where similar houses on similar streets carry different school assignments and different taxing districts. That line is the single most important thing to understand here.

WHY THE COUNTY LINE MATTERS

Crossing it changes the school district, the property tax districts and levies, and which city services apply. It does not announce itself on the ground — SW 65th Avenue looks the same on both sides.

Two practical consequences. First, never assume a school assignment from a neighborhood name; confirm it by address with the district. Second, Oregon's assessed value does not reset when a home sells, so compare the county's actual assessed figure rather than estimating tax from the purchase price.

Jurisdiction, county and school district per the U.S. Census and district boundaries. Attendance areas and district boundaries are revised from time to time and vary by address — verify both with the relevant district before relying on them.

Goose Hollow

SW PORTLAND

The most urban address of the four, wrapped around Providence Park at the foot of the West Hills. Daniel Lowndale put a tannery here in 1845; the stadium stands on the site. Interstate 405 took out large pieces of the neighborhood in the 1960s, which is why historic houses and modern towers now sit side by side.

Suits buyers who want to leave the car parked — light rail, downtown and Washington Park are all walkable.

Maplewood

SW PORTLAND

Almost entirely residential, running west of SW 45th to the city limit between Vermont and Multnomah Boulevard. Rolling ground, cottage-scale houses, and a high rate of owner occupancy. April Hill Park has trails down to Woods Creek, and Gabriel Park and the Southwest Community Center sit just across 45th.

Suits buyers who want quiet and trees while staying inside Portland city limits.

Garden Home

WASHINGTON COUNTY

Maplewood's western neighbor, immediately across the county line. Named for the Oregon Electric Railway depot that opened here in the early 1900s; the Whitford half of the name survives mainly as a Beaverton middle school. Around 7,000 residents, on generous lots, with its own recreation center.

Suits buyers who want Portland proximity with Beaverton schools and Washington County taxes.

West Slope

WASHINGTON COUNTY

A little over 1.6 square miles between Portland and Beaverton, south of US-26 and northwest of Raleigh Hills. Around 7,200 residents on mid-century streets under mature tree cover. The highway sits close enough for a genuinely short run into either city.

Suits buyers weighing a westside commute who still want established streets and larger lots.
